Dear Administrator Zeldin,

I am writing in support of the petition put forth by Appalachian Voices, the Sierra Club, Public Justice, and environmental and community groups to address pollution from open-top coal trains. I urge you to pass a rule to strengthen regulation of this type of pollution. Coal harms communities throughout its entire lifecycle — during mining, processing, transportation and burning at power plants. Requiring coal train cars to cover coal loads will prevent coal dust from polluting the air and prevent dust and coal particles from polluting water and harming the environment.

Pollution from coal trains impacts a huge portion of the country, from mining areas in West Virginia and Wyoming, to export terminals in Washington and Virginia, and everywhere along the routes between. The problem is spread across the nation and therefore requires a uniform federal solution. Five hundred pounds of coal or more can escape from a single loaded car.

Visible dust covers homes and property, and the invisible fine particulate matter can have devastating health consequences. Fugitive coal mine dust is a significant source of both fine and coarse particulate matter. Fine particulate matter pollution kills nearly 100,000 people in the United States every year, and causes asthma attacks, hospitalizations and emergency room visits for cardiopulmonary diseases (1). Multiple studies in multiple locations have indicated that coal trains increase the concentration of particulate matter, often to levels above the annual National Ambient Air Quality Standard (2,3).

Coal particles and dust can build up on train ballasts, preventing water from draining properly, and therefore increasing the likelihood of train derailments. Coal particles and dust can also build up in rivers, streams and marine environments, increasing turbidity of the water and accumulation of fine particles in the bottom of waterways. This can have multiple impacts, including reducing the ability of predators to see prey, clogging gills of fish and invertebrates, and filling in habitat used for shelter and reproducing.

Though coal is commonly known for its high carbon content, it is a sedimentary rock made of a mixture of different components, including toxic heavy metal and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAH). PAHs have been identified in marine environments near coal export terminals (4). Coal particles have been shown to harm marine invertebrates by increasing exposure to toxic metals such as cadmium through both direct exposure and food web exposure (5).

Please pass a rule to address pollution from open-top coal train cars. The health of people and the environment depend on it.

Thank you,
